The modification is usually achieved by culturing of ova and embryos in vitro, followed by insemination, cryopreservation, and, for species with external fertilisation, transfer into the uterus of the mother. If ova and embryos can be cultured individually, in vitro culture of bovine ova or embryos in vitro is possible from 2 days after ovulation. The best practical method for providing cultured in vitro embryos is to remove them from the donor cow or heifer shortly after ovulation and then to surgically implant them into a surrogate mother. The total procedure from oocyte collection to implantation into a recipient cow takes about 40 to 50 days. The objective of the present invention is the production of live, viable fertilised bovine embryos using protocols which shorten the time-to-embryo culture and also the time-to-implantation. In early mammalian pregnancies, the mammalian conceptus is maintained in its testes or ovaries in a dormant, but highly viable state. This dormant state is manifested in the cessation of development and growth. When these embryos are artificially transferred to a uterus, they have difficulty in implantation due to the absence of secretions of the uterus. The implantation of a conceptus is a result of a complex process, wherein the implantation is triggered by maternal recognition of a conceptus, which is, in turn, recognised by the local site of implantation. The process of recognition is critical to a successful pregnancy. Therefore, removal of the conceptus prior to the endometrial phase of the cycle should increase the time of
