primary and secondary keys, used to find the data, are carried in the file header. The file header consists of a number of mandatory fields, such as the file name, access rights, size, time, etc. These mandatory fields are used in the matching process which is described in the following paragraphs. The file block consists of data. The file block is stored on a number of hosts. NFS mounts a file or directory on a number of hosts. The block number is calculated on the basis of the offset of the file's metadata. The offset of the metadata is calculated on the basis of a file's offset in the file system. The nodelist is a list of the hosts in which the file or directory is stored. This list is used to find out which hosts contain the data. The open flag indicates that the file is open and that all blocks have been allocated. The flag also identifies the hosts containing the
