But scientific research continues to learn more about biology and brain development. Oren and Segal question whether homosexuality is genetic. They say the odds of a non-biological explanation are too low. That's scientifically wrong. You may notice that on average, children born into same-sex parent families are two to three times more likely to identify as gay or lesbian than children whose parents are different sexes. And, often, they are biologically more likely to be gay. But the recent findings contradict the notion that it's biological. That may be so, but they also add credence to the notion that biology is only one of the complex factors involved in determining a child's sexual orientation. Also, homosexual attraction is very, very common. Not everyone who is attracted to the same sex experiences sexual arousal and orgasm on occasion. And not everyone who has had both experiences is necessarily homosexual. And again, these are just some of the commonalities that many gay people share. They don't tell the whole story. They don't make it simple or black and white. We would do well to remember that. But to also recognize that some are biologically gay, and some aren't. This isn't about labels. This is about understanding. So far, homosexuality appears more likely to occur in some families than in others, in other words to be genetically influenced. And, again, it's a minority of the population that says they are gay. But to say, as the article did, that it is biologically preordained - to be gay - is scientifically unjustifiable. It can't even be said to be scientifically incorrect. But it certainly is scientifically misinformed and misleading
