on MySQL EventStore and Kafka stream processing I'm busy working on Gatling, a toolkit for modelling and executing real time queries, in addition to normal SQL queries. One of the more interesting things to me is how we represented the queries internally. The query execution side of Gatling is very simple: hit a repository and get results back. However, the connections to the underlying database are extraordinarily complex to model and maintain. At the lowest level, a transaction is represented by a SQL statement. This statement is in turn executed by a cursor (a bound variable or parameter that the engine can reference when declaring the semantics of the SQL statement). The cursor is used to receive the result of the query. Simple enough. This is something that I've also run into a lot in the HBase event sourcing world. If you take a look at another recent post I did: How Cassandra and Event Store work together, and notice that in it, I talk about that data column being implemented in two ways. It can be expressed in a database, or it could be just treated as a byte sequence held within a map. The external side of it, the reader of the database, can just read directly off the map. In the end we've decided to use primarily database storage, but we've extended it to hold an integer value (actually a range of integers). This field is much like the counter that HBase also holds. Instead of treating it as a number, however, we just treat it as an always increasing list of integers. Entering data to this field, is simply a matter of iterating over the range and appending the numbers. When the data is being read out the field is simply read off the map. As long as the developer adds integers in order, this solution works great. That gets us a maximum of six days of data, though. In order to get more data, we also have to figure out how to expand the field. We can't just cut it off, because there's no practical way of implementing an arbitrary range in a database. In HBase, if you've ever used that field definition, you probably noticed it ended in an infinite range '.) That means we have to write some code to round off the last day, and the last used number, before doubling the range size. Each time we insert a day we get the number of the previous day. When
