The current campus offerings consist of just 16 courses from a full schedule of more than 100, including associate's degrees. "We're working on building a program that fits the needs of today's student with the ability to meet student needs through distance education," said Albert R. Minchey, the school's director of distance education. On Wednesday, UNF hosted a community forum to discuss the proposed changes and let the public know what the initiative would entail. According to Minchey, UNF will let current UNF students easily pick up where they left off in the classroom if they decide to continue their education at the university.
