The first problem is that a digital video file is compressed. A compressed file is basically a compression format with little or no loss of video or audio quality. A compressor like Adobe Premiere Pro CS6 allows you to use on-the-fly effects on the original media, some of which are easy to control using non-destructive editing and no audio sync issues. If you want to spend more time to remove the dross and to create a tighter edit, you'll move to a different part of the video material, then recompress that, using an entirely different set of effects and parameters, and so on and so on. Since compressing a video file can cause it to lose a lot of its image and sound quality, taking the same file and compressing it multiple times can make that loss much worse. Most online video hosts like Vimeo and YouTube will re-compress the video you upload, so you want to make sure that you maintain as much quality as you can before it gets to them. Whenever possible, you'll want to edit and master from your source footage or transcode to uncompressed or lossless codecs to maintain media quality. Penguins don't look scary and angry on YouTube, but the video quality on the iPhone's camera is so bad, it's almost as if they were. Luckily, with this, you can make your own Angry Birds videos and share them on Facebook and YouTube! You can even download videos from videos YouTube and Google to create your own Angry Birds movies. Need to get some quick inspiration for a video? You can find video cutouts and animations on YouTube! You can also record your own voice and edit the music into the video! You can even download Angry Birds videos and edit them to upload to YouTube or Facebook. This app is a great way to express your love and appreciation to the Red Bird. Sec8ef588b
