We often think of these communications as being a nuisance, but before you know it, they can truly begin to take over your life. "The volume of unwanted messages is staggering," says Tony Evans, CEO and chief product officer of Vocus, a company that helps people regulate their digital lives. "If you have a smartphone, you probably get close to 3,000 text messages a day, and that's just from one service." So what is a person to do if they receive a text message or an IM that they don't want? Here are some examples of a few of the more common unwanted communications, and what to do if you receive one: Spam. You know it's spam when you get it - unsolicited messages sent from a source you don't know or have never been in contact with before. They can be, and often are, a nuisance. But, as previously discussed, by far the largest reason people receive these types of messages is because it's one of the most successful ways to get you to click on a link and visit a website. And, sadly, people who click on links can be very surprised by what they find. "This is why it's important to install anti-virus software and use it regularly," Evans says. "If you don't protect yourself, you are much more likely to unwittingly click on a fraudulent link or enter private or credit card information when dealing with a website that is trying to scam you." Phishing. When a legitimate company sends an email, text, or IM telling you to confirm an account or a password, it's called phishing. These communications often come from sources you know (e.g.
