Agreed. I am using it to add to my workflow - more akin to an afterthought than LR4 was. The lack of priority in changes is disappointing, but the smaller changes are nice. In reading other user comments, I wonder which version they are talking about - LR5 or LR5.1 or RC? First, I use LR to copy files to a JPEG "card" from Aperture before I drop them off at the webshop to sell. LR does this in one second flat.

Second, I use LR to copy files from Aperture as a JPEG backup. So I get the RAW data from Aperture. I use LR on my Mac to process the RAW's more expensive in bits. 50% of the time I'm using LR, the other 50% I'm using Capture One (a professional raw processor). I'm only doing this described as alternate editing method, because I don't want to mess things up. (Not due to any technical skill, but due to my inexperience with it, and having the feeling that I could damage the JPEG's.)

So they are separate products, done for different purposes.

Best regards The "serious image editing" part of the latest Photoshop release is nice to have, and so far I'm enjoying Lightroom for the cataloging job. It gets the job done, and I'm working around PS. The tool is definitely in its infancy as far as being the AND ("Adobe for Everyone" release). One of the most important reasons to upgrade to the Adobe Creative Cloud is the ability to collaborate with other professionals throughout a production workflow.
