The biggest difference with new versions of Photoshop is that you can now create adjustments for images shot in RAW and convert them into different formats, and even control the export profiles from Lightroom 5. A quick test shows that it worked like a charm—all the settings were applied correctly, and the export came out as I intended. The method is very simple and it's a welcome addition to Photoshop. To create an adjustment, go to Edit > Develop > Adjustment Layers. Use the Adjustment Libraries > Adjustment Layers > Add Adjustment Layers command to add an adjustment layer. If you decide to use the adjustment layer as the basis for your image, the Adjustment layer lets you change settings on the basis of a selection such as color, black and white, or split toning. In addition, if you select a portion of the image and adjust each individual adjustment layer when you export to different formats, you can adjust the color as a consistent global change. Red, one of the major differences to Photoshop CC 2018, is the Black & White adjustment. This adjustment ensures that your black-and-white images are brought to the foreground to provide a single reference point when adjusting your image. If you have more grey tones in your image, they become centered over the image and make it easier to watch what you're doing without being overwhelmed by the amount of other tonal details. If you've got an arty black-and-white image, this setting can be really nice.
