Lightroom is more configurable than ever, with more than a thousand settings. New users get the idea of configuring settings the same way they configure Windows, with all sorts of submenu items, dropdowns, and whatnot. If you're used to using Lightroom the new interface might be a bit difficult to learn. Lightroom uses a plethora of settings that can have a real impact on either the file size or the image quality. I like that Lightroom now indicates the effect of a given setting. A tick in the "Setting Name" column means a setting has been enabled—either as a default (little label), as a manual setting, or as a developer option (little label with big font). A cross on the column means a setting has been disabled. You get all sorts of visual and audible alerts when you select one of the developer settings that have a significant effect on the final image file. A fill in the search bar will not necessarily work. Marrying the new user interface to the new features I've talked about, I've significantly cut down the number of times I have to open a dialog box to get the instance I want to open. There are a lot more options available, and I guess in an attempt to accommodate this, it's become less intuitive to switch across panels. Does anyone like me see more gray than the Chandler when switching? The idea of importing or exporting projects to PDFs caught my eye, and I tried this extensively. You see, I work with a lot of print clients and end users, and I always try to make my own prints and proofs, including having them stamped, signed, printed, and returned with a signature. To do so, I have to upload the test prints to a website. I realized that if I could just export any file to a PDF, I could use it as a proof or go directly to my print-shop. I have tried this on several occasions: it works, and it works well. But then I think about what would happen if I had two or more paper files that I wanted to prepare as PDFs.
