The Big Question is this: What do you want to do? Do you want to make aesthetic decisions or do you want to make more technical and creative decisions? If you want to just play with color and make adjustments then you should use Photoshop, while if you want to make more informed aesthetic decisions then Lightroom is the tool for you. Both can do the same thing and the reason there is so much confusion is that Lightroom and Photoshop are two different programs that do two different things. Lightroom and Photoshop are separate and different users need to use them separately. Hopefully, this article clears up the confusion for you and provides you with the tools needed to make the best decisions for you based on the situation you face. When was the first time you heard the words "photography?" Right, people never use that word, but there it is within the first 10 seconds of explaining photography. It's easy to conceptualize the idea that we take pictures with a camera and then post those pictures on Facebook. But it's not totally perfect, and it's certainly not what I want to do with my life. This is what motivates me to create the best tools and best content possible, so I can produce images I'm proud of. I believe, when we think about photography, we – as an industry – need to go back to the basics, with controls, lenses and cameras, and instead of just making tools that our clients can buy and use to make their own artistic decisions, we should be making tools that allow people to do what they really want to do and dream as a photographer. I'm motivated to make the best tools out there and to collaborate with the best to make it happen. I want to help people help themselves. That's what started it all, is helping them to help themselves. That's when our passion for the art of photography well and truly blossoms. e3d0a04c9c
